CHALLENGES AHEAD

Next Pope must reinforce spiritual leadership over a less deferential flock

By Tony Barber in Rome

In 1798 French revolutionary forces occupied Rome, declared it a republic and deposed Pope Pius VI, who died one year later in exile and captivity in southern France. Pius VII, his successor, was to receive similar ill-treatment at the hands of Napoleon Bonaparte, the French emperor.

But whereas it was mainly the papacy's future as a European temporal power that was at stake in those upheavals, now it is the Roman Catholic Church's ability to hold together its worldwide flock and enforce its spiritual leadership that is under scrutiny as it prepares for a new era under John Paul II's successor.

of Catholic faithful from their native parishes and, in many countries, detached the new working class from organised religion.

In the late 20th century and early 21st century, the biggest threat to the Church's control over its Latin flock came to be its attitude to women and the sexual revolution that began in the 1960s.

Thomas Reese, an expert on the US Roman Catholic Church, says that, if the Church loses educated women in this century as it lost European working-class men more than 100 years, then "it will be in serious trouble".

Much of the blame for this is often laid at John Paul's door, yet in truth the problem, it is highly likely that the Church will take the first steps to making John Paul a saint, rendering his ethical pronouncements all but unalterable.

In the text of a homily prepared for delivery yesterday at a requiem mass for John Paul, Cardinal Angelo Sodano, the Vatican's secretary of state and number two in the Church hierarchy, referred to the late-Pope as "John Paul the Great".

The label "Great" has not been applied to a Pope for 1,400 years, and even though Cardinal Sodano did not in fact speak the word when giving his sermon, it was a sign that John Paul's beatification and canonisation are a sure bet.

Precisely for this reason,

Choosing the next Pope

- Cardinals meet in daily sessions in Rome to prepare the funeral and the election of the Pope's successor
- If a vote is inconclusive, the ballot papers are treated with chemicals and burnt: black smoke coming from the Vatican chimney indicates that no new Pope has been elected, white smoke means that there is a new Pope
- After the funeral, there are nine days of mourning, known as the 'novendiales'
- If after three days, there is no successor, another seven votes take place
- The conclave of the College of Cardinals, which elects the Pope, must be held within 15 to 20 days of the Pope's death
- Once there is a successor, the senior
